The apostle had been beckoned into Macedonia by a vision, and that vision still haunted him. Every temple he beheld, and every form of idolatry he witnessed, brought back the picture. Help was needed everywhere in the province, and he had brought it. The cruel treatment at Philippi did not detain him from the farther prosecution of his labours. His spirit sank not, though he had been subjected to the scourge. That indignity was a severe trial to him--to few more than to him. The knout brings no disgrace to a Russian serf, and wheals are usually found on the backs of American slaves. But the lash must have been felt as an unspeakable ignominy by one of Pauls refined and elevated temperament and he afterwards characterized the treatment as shameful. But he bore it as did the Lord before him. He did not sink into sullenness, and feel self-degraded at such outrage done to him as a man, and such a violation of right inflicted on him as a Roman citizen. It did not stand out in solitary gloom and bitterness as-- One fatal remembrance, one sorrow that throws Its bleak shade alike oer his joy and his woes To which life nothing darker or brighter can bring, For which joy hath no balm, and affliction no sting. He left Philippi because it afforded no prospect of immediate usefulness. But he prosecuted his great work, and travelled south and west along the Egnatian road thirtythree miles to Amphipolis on the Strymonic gulf, but did not stay there advanced thirty miles farther to Apollonia, but rested not there either journeyed onwards other thirtyseven miles, and arrived at Thessalonica. This city, at the head of the Thermaic gulf, had then and has still a...
